Where Leaders Shape the Future of AI and Law

Welcome to Generative Legal

We're excited to welcome you to our first gathering in New York City, at Cornell Tech. As the world's largest legal market, New York is home to more of the people we started Generative Legal for than any other city: legal leaders who are shaping their organizations' response to AI and who believe, as we do, that they will make better decisions by learning from one another.

When we last convened at Stanford six months ago, we shared our motivations for founding Generative Legal. An important one, and perhaps the intellectual seed of all this, was that progress in legal AI was accelerating in too many directions for any one person or even a well-resourced team to reliably follow. A community of legal leaders comparing notes, however, would have as much of a fighting chance as anyone.

We won't claim any grand insight in having expected AI to keep improving, and predicting that progress will accelerate further still hardly counts as bold. What we did not foresee was how quickly so extraordinary a community would form: it now includes leaders from a third of the Am Law 100 and from many of the Fortune 500. Generative Legal: Cornell Tech has drawn interest from leaders around the world in numbers many times what its intimacy permits.

One measure we hold ourselves to is whether the conversations between sessions, and the connections you form at Generative Legal, prove of lasting value as you return to the hard questions in your own organizations. To meet it, we know we have to attract the leading people in the field. We believe that we have, and colleagues like you are the proof.
